Broken Knees of Horses. Will you sliow me to commend to the notice of your readers the tineture of marigold (Calendula officinalis) as a remedy for badly broken knees in horson? I am not aware that the use Calknown but is really invaluable. Last known but is really invaluable. Last August I had, through the eardinances of my groom, a valuable more thrown down; she lell on the bard road and got what is called a regular mucker; the three of bec fore leg was badly and despiy cut, and that the off leg was cut, but not to so great an extent; the skin was grazed off her nose, and in other respects site was injured. I and all who in the mare thought that her near know that it short an animal for which only a few days previously £ 50 had been trefasel, would by reason of accident be worth acquirely one quarter of that sum. Before applying the tinctore, I had every particle of grit carefully removed from the knee by means of a spong and warm water; when this had been done, I satured source pieces of lint with the Calendula lotton, made in the prothe Calendata lotton, made in the proportion of ten drops of the tincture to two tablespoonfuls of water; on the line I placed a piece of oilskin cut into the shape of a knee-cap, and this I tied on the broken knee; the line was kept constantly moist. In the course of three or four days the wound had made wonderful progress towards recovery; the flesh was brought forward, and the surfeet progress towards recovery the feet progress towards recovery the feet was brought forward, and the surface rapidly became smooth. The knee has now for some time past been perfectly healed, and the hair has grown beautifully on it, without any of that harshness or carling which so commonly disfigures a knee that has been broken. I would defy any one to tell that the mare had been down. Arnica is a famous remedy, I know, for broken knees, but where the mischief done has been great and cut deep, I do not be here there is anything like the tincture.
